The relationship that we share has been an essential part of my transition to Reed College, and it is also one of the most valuable experiences that I have shared throughout my time at Reed.”

The Host Family Program

Every fall Reed welcomes approximately twenty degree-seeking international students, ten foreign exchange students, and eight language scholars to campus.

These students and scholars come to Reed to learn and grow through experiences in the classroom and on campus. Many, however, also want to learn about U.S. culture through personal experience with the politics, economics, geography, culture, and people of the local community.

The hospitality of a local family gives a multidimensional view of life in the U.S., provides support, and helps to overcome the isolation of life on campus. Experiences outside the classroom and beyond the dormitory are an illuminating and important part of an international student or scholar’s stay.

The host family program, coordinated by International Student Services (ISS), offers a mutually rewarding relationship between a local family and a foreign visitor, giving each the opportunity to learn from the other.

“Hosting has been a wonderful experience. [Our student] is basically a member of our family now.”

—Willie Koo, host
What is a host family?

The term host family can be somewhat misleading. Reed’s international students and language scholars live on campus and therefore there is no expectation that host families will provide room and board.

Instead, host families act as a liaison between international visitors and the community. The relationship begins when families welcome students and scholars to Portland by picking them up from the airport, bringing them to campus, and helping them settle into their dorm rooms. Then, during the school year, ISS organizes three structured on-campus events to bring international visitors and their host families together as a group.

Outside of these activities, the program allows the relationship between a student or scholar and a family to develop organically. The only request is that families connect in person with the student or scholar monthly. Typical activities include

- inviting the student or scholar over for dinner;
- sharing holiday celebrations;
- introducing the student or scholar to many of the wonderful activities that are available in the Portland area.

There is no “right” way to be a host family, but making contact on a regular basis and simply spending time together is an important part of having a successful experience.

How to Become a Host Family

ISS believes that finding a good fit between a family and an international student or scholar is important. The process of becoming a host family is as follows:

Ongoing: host family applications received and screened

Late May: host families receive student bios

Mid-June: host families return student preference list

Early July: host families receive student match information

Mid-July: students and families make initial contact

Mid-August: new host family orientation session

Mid-late August: students and scholars arrive

Late August: first organized event, during International Orientation
“We just had our first Reed international student come back for his 10th reunion. He and his wife stayed at our house. Another one of our Reedies, from India, graduated from Lewis and Clark Law School last year. She has all of her holiday meals (and more) at our house. Another German student of ours, sends me an email every year on my birthday. It goes on and on. Hosting was a great experience for us.”
