Using the equilibrium phase diagram of the Solow model, show that an increase in the saving rate increases the steady-state level of investment per effective labor unit by more than it increases the steady-state level of income per effective labor unit if the production function at the initial steady-state k^* is flatter than the break-even investment line.